

how to be compassionate and humble with trans

Posted by turning.point - 27 Feb 2023 02:28

---

Rabotai, your help please. How do you address a person who claims different pronouns? Have you had this experience? In my line of work I deal with it very often, like more than once a week.

My own answers to this are on my "what works for me" thread. I don't include them here because I want your answers to be yours.

Thank you in advance for your responses and thoughts, whether they be considerate or immediate.

=====

=====

Re: how to be compassionate and humble with trans

Posted by simchastorah - 27 Feb 2023 04:38

---

what a tough situation to be in, hatzlacha. I have 0 advice on this, I would be at a complete loss

=====

=====

Re: how to be compassionate and humble with trans

Posted by turning.point - 19 Mar 2023 00:41

---

Does anyone believe the reason that our daughters want to remove their breasts and uteruses in secret is because we are using p in secret? That we can't say "no" to our daughters because we can't say "no" to ourselves?

=====

=====

Re: how to be compassionate and humble with trans

Posted by jackthejew - 19 Mar 2023 17:18

---

I'd say that it goes deeper than that. The trans agenda and ideology is built on the falsehood that I can I can understand "My Truth" better than everyone else around me and those who came before me. It's the true elevation of the idol of self. The concept of Botloh Da'atoi Etezel Kol Adam is the response to this. Even for those who truly have these feelings (In many cases nowadays it certainly seems to be more social contagion than legitimate mental illness, especially amongst teenage girls) that just means they have an unfortunate mental condition. The whole concept of affirmation is the antithesis of how illness is treated. We don't treat multiple personality disorder by inviting all the selves to a Shidduch Roundtable. The institution these people are fighting against is not lack of compassion, caring, and love, but rather against truth and reality. The claim that a man knows the inner self of being a woman to the point of realizing that he really is one is quite preposterous. The question is how to deal with this in everyday life, and that depends on many realities and variables. However, the overall Hashkafa of what's going on here I think is pretty clear.

=====

=====