I submitted the following comment, which they posted (with minor edits):

I agree with the thrust of this article. However, the key is not to look back, but to look ahead and take action, both on an individual and community level.

Filters may not be perfect, but they probably block 95% of the really bad stuff. Using a filter (password held by the woman of the household or by a trusted third party), combined with accountability software, such as eBlaster (which sends reports to a third party; again, password held by a third party), works quite well. We need to do this, not only for ourselves, but for future generations.

We should also do our best to avoid brand new technology UNTIL good safety measures become available, usually 1-2 years after the new technology is introduced.

Finally, for those who have gotten involved with Internet pornography to the point of addiction, would love to stop but can't, and are living double lives, I've been there, and I know how painful this can be. Today, Boruch Hashem, I am clean for a year and a half. Please visit www.GuardYourEyes.org today to begin the road to recovery.

A follow-up comment:

In 2007, Rav Hershel Schachter spoke about the dangers of the Internet and the precautions that should be taken. The name of the Shiur is "How open is too open?" (a Google search should pull it up).

People will have to figure out that it's 2 different Davids (I didn't notice your comment until after I posted). It's a very common name, after all (although, it's not my real name).
