Why is it Ok? The guy starts a thread where even the subject line is a lie and then proceeds to waste everybody's time with baseless arguments about why he can't change. And after you've finally proven that he's wrong, he just starts up again.

And you want to know why it's ok to bash him?

for years i did things that are wrong. yet if you would have asked me if i want to be good i would have said that "yes, i want to be good". yet i still went back to the garbage.

the imaginary corners an addiction paints a person into can seem inescapable. did you never feel that in your life? would it be helpful or even justified to ridicule someone in that situation?

No I would not.

But if you came to me under the guise of wanting me to convince you why you should stop and asked me to put in time and effort in that, and then ignored anything you were ever told and asked the exact same questions again and again and put forth the same inane arguments, yes I would ridicule you.

I'm not ridiculing him for falling, I'm ridiculing him for wasting everybody's time and not listening to a word he's told.

ridicule does not seem to be a healthy way to relate to people, even if there is a perceived wrong

You guys are hilarious! OK, so Laag seems to have bailed or taken a hiatus of some kind. Being one with the capacity to be a major idiot myself, I kind of like the guy....

I think that the majority of us in here have flaws (other than the obvious), and Laag's are surprisingly honest, at least in an anonymous environment...

I think that there is a difference between ridicule and rebuke. I don't think that anyone should ridicule (and I don't think anyone did, really), but we need to tread carefully in rebuke.
