

I AM A NON ADDICT

Posted by Markz - 15 Feb 2017 03:50

Warning: Spoiler!

Click on the spoiler for interesting info

I have a reputation to say things how they are, and I don't intend ruining that

The truth will stand forever

We don't need 2 sections for addicts and non addicts, and if there would be, I'd reside on the addict section although I'm a non addict

We need 2 sections

- 1) Guys that want to break free on GYE terms
- 2) Guys that want to do so on their own terms and conditions

I can identify the few members that wish to reside on section 2, and I wish them well.

Cut it out this non addict business

If I would act out every 2 months and could not physically stop, I'd consider myself an addict

Is gye gonna have an addict test before being accepted to each forum?

I assure you not. Then who are we kidding?

Ourselves

When will we grow up?

Never

You are definitely entitled to your opinion but when I joined the yearly GYE board meeting they were quite emphatic that there need to be two different venues. And my assumption is that anyone trying to break free is trying to do so on GYE terms - emails, forums, shiurim, taphsic, phone conferences, sponsors, partners, etc.

Why would they need separate websites?

Each man can find what he needs now , the way the website is beautifully designed.

Oh - so you want a separate foru

I love all guys on the forum

Watson is a classic example (I love him too) of someone that fought valiantly to retain his dignity as a non addict

I assure you MOST guys want to subscribe to that section. But is that how they recover?

I have a more serious question I hope the GYE board takes into account

- 1. How many regular forum posters that passed 90 days are non addicts?
- 2. Out of those, how many want a separate forum?

You know how I vote if it counts for anything

I'm going to vote for one forum as well. I'm not just saying it- the term addict and non addict are so non scientific and many of the people who don't think they are probably are, and many who think they aren't, are.

And there's tons of value to be gained by each.

Am I an addict? I haven't masturbated in 200 days and only two or three times in the past year.

I can obsessively test my filter sometimes, or have no problem with an open computer. I quit porn cold turkey six years ago and never went back.

But I watched other stuff.

Had no problem considering myself an addict, but not so sure I am- not sure how much I really wanted to stop the parts that I wasn't stopping.

The net effect of my behaviors was pretty low level over the past few years, the ups and downs maybe not.

The non addict section wouldn't have done it for me, but I haven't done half of what some of the addicts have. So what?

And some of the addicts are the most inspiring- because they've done crazy work to bounce back and have true levels of sobriety. And some of the non addicts would maybe bounce around forever.

Your points sound very valid. Personally I have definitely gained from the addicts, however I do see where there is a lot of confusion which appears to scare away some newcomers. I suggest you be in touch with GYE to share your concerns. Hatzlocha to all yidden with whatever mehalech they are taking.

I was speaking with someone from GYE who has been extremely helpful to me and numerous others. He has BH passed over 1,000 days. He said Dov told him that most people (including this friend)are not addicts and they have to build up the resolve to fight their yetzer hora. He stopped posting on the forums because with the exception of Dov, he found that there were people "from the addict camp" who sarcastically, cynically, and as he says it, "in a very stuck up fashion", tried to intimidate others into submissively admitting they were addicts. Although I have seen what he is referring to, personally I don't care when people challenge my opinions in a rude or arrogant fashion. Besides which, everyone has what to offer, and we can learn from everyone even if we don't approve of their style. However, realize that many non addicts get turned off from the forums very fast and simply leave. They remain with the rest of the GYE site and BH recover using the other tools generously offered by this wonderful organization. With that in mind, GYE wants to set up forums where they will feel comfortable and not intimidated.

1) Regular forum poster

I'm pretty regular (eating enough fiber helps)

2) Passed 90 days clean

Yes

3) And consider yourself a non addict

I think I'm somewhere borderline, I've been "clean" for a while but struggle daily with guarding eyes, fantasy etc. I've never "done" the steps but I think anyone can gain by learning about them and applying the principles even informally and alone. Self-acceptance, surrender, living ODAAT, building a connection with G-d, working on our character defects and so on.

I don't see the point of separate forums, we all have plenty to learn from each other. We can accept that we each have a different level of struggle and that there are different paths to growth. We can encourage each other and share what works for us, and give suggestions and advice in a spirit of caring.

I completely understand.

Very often we get a newcomer who insists on doing it all his way - the same thing he's been doing for years and years unsuccessfully. So what should I as a longer-term member do? To keep stroking his ego ("you're doing amazing") tacitly encourages him to continue doing what doesn't work. To point out that what he's doing doesn't work makes him defensive and accuse me of the things you describe in your post.

BTW, I think it's a very touchy subject because of the moral judgement people hear, which is not surprising given most of our educational background. I don't see it as a moral judgement at all. Someone who's sober longer isn't a better person than someone who's not sober as long, much like someone in yeshiva gedolah isn't a better person than someone in yeshiva ketanah. But the shame and implied judgement is deeply ingrained in us.

The reason I understand your post so well is because I was on the receiving end of it. I came here as a non-addict trying to force myself to be sober using the same tools I came with. I insisted that I was not an addict and my life was perfectly manageable (except from staying up all hours watching porn so my new wife wouldn't catch me). It was the 'sarcastic and cynical' addicts here that slowly made me (despite my resentment towards them) face the reality that I needed to do the unthinkable for my recovery - to get out from behind my keyboard and get real. First I joined a GYE conference call, and later SA. Now I'm calmer, happier, healthier, a better husband and father, a better employee, etc. Those 'stuck-up, arrogant' people saved my life.

I do post constantly

I have not reached 90 days as of yet

I do not consider myself an addict

I do not want separate forums

I do not have more to add from what Markz and Watson and Gevurah have to say but in my own words

I have learnt a lot about myself and how to think because of the addicts especially one in particular who gets a lot of flack for his bluntness and is poorly understood but in my experience with him he is a wonderful example of being honest and straight to the point and will make the time to talk to anyone privately even when he has crazy things going on in his life (he actually emailed me to try and explain something I posted and is still trying)

I am very grateful to these people and would be very upset if this was taken away from me and others to the point that I would have a hard time not making Markz look tame

I fully understand what Watson and Mayan have written and as I stated above I personally did not get scared away by the intimidation. I agree that everyone who contributes to the forums and takes out their time to assist others is a real "mezakeh es ho'rabim". That being said, a non addict should have a place where he feels comfortable reaching out for chizuk without being slammed. He may not be ready for the facing of reality yet. More importantly, he may not need it to the extent others do. Dov told me for example not to go to SA meetings. He didn't feel I needed them. My "unmanagability thermometer" wasn't at that level. Another example is a sponsor (who religiously goes to SA meetings) I met through the site who is an addict, who after getting to know me told me "the 12 steps are good for everyone, but a non addict like you should get close to Hashem through sifrei mussar and machshovo built on Chazal and not through the 12 steps". So although I personally maybe from time to time wouldn't mind getting addict advice being that as you and I wrote, there is what to be gained from everyone (and specifically in the case of habit breaking, the addicts have loads of experience), I fully understand why GYE would like to make a forum area for people who they determine don't need the roughing up.

Feel comfortable falling and doing teshuvah constantly and no one giving positive input to really help me break free?

A separate website should be created

GYE

guard your ego

You say there are people that tried to intimidate others into submissively admitting they were addicts

Please show me 1 instance of that. Email to me please markzgye@gmail.com

I have read virtually every post since I joined 1 1/2 years ago and cannot support your statement

Even if it was true what you claim, that guy that's intimidating, can easily be resolved by our admin or moderators. And not a reason for a separate website.

Moreover, do you really believe there can't be intimidators on a "non addict" website?
