Well, the short answer is, perhaps, but (1) there's ALOT (read - years and years and years) to climb/travel/traverse to get to that "high enough level", and (2) that "high enough level" is not necessarily attainable for the vast majority of people.

I guess where that leaves (most) of us is, take it as it comes and try to devise healthier reactions to triggers and life's inherent stresses, no?

Are we starting again?

Should we make some sort of accountability system (like thanking that weeks post when you finish or posting that you did it) to make it more likely to happen?

Is anyone interested?

Any other ideas?

I haven't read the book in a while and I am interested in starting. I don't mind putting a thank you at the end of the week. I think it shouldn't end up a competition of who is reading the book and who isn't so I am not sure whether it is a good idea, unless we say ???? ?????? ???? ?????. Also, those who aren't reading the book might not want everyone to know that, although they may be reading on a different schedule and we wouldn't know whether they are reading the book.
